Which one is correct? Which users? or Which user? A: Neither. In your example sentence, "which user" is the subject of the verb "is", so there is no need to preface it with a possessive: Which users do you want to see again? Which users should we see again? If the word you are referring to were omitted from the sentence, the possessive would be "it" or "him" or "them". I am the owner of this book. Which book is it? Edit To me, it seems obvious that you mean user. You are probably more interested in knowing the gender than what the user is. So I would go with: Which user should we see again? My guess is that "which user" is used because you want to know which users there are to choose from. A: The two sentences: which users and which user

has concluded that a warrant to search the premises of a home should be supported by a stronger showing of probable cause than is required to search the person of an individual. These exceptions are only available in a limited number of cases, and the police must find their justification in one of the well established exceptions to the warrant requirement such as exigent circumstances, a dwelling of fellow soldiers, or voluntary consent. But in neither the Chimel case nor today's opinion does the Court acknowledge the possibility that the somewhat more stringent probable cause standard governing searches of the person might be relaxed in a case involving the search of a dwelling house. In this regard, I think it interesting to note that the leading decision of the Court upholding a general search of a residence without a warrant since the Chimel case was handed down is Bumper v. North Carolina, 391 U. S. 543, and, as the Court itself concedes, it would require something less than probable cause to search the chambers of a physician engaged in the practice of medicine. For while it is true that the physician-patient relationship presents a private setting, this is not a foundation upon which to rest a constitutional rule requiring that a lesser standard of probable cause be applied in the protection of the home. See Johnson v. United States, 333 U. S. 10, 11-12, and it is not one which the Chimel case or today's opinion has undertaken to validate. Given the unanimous historical rejection of this sort of general search of a private residence, it seems to me that there is really only one reasonable course to take in a case like this. This Court should overrule Chimel, and its progeny, and I would hold that whatever reasonable search of the premises of a house is justified in the course of a lawful search incident to an arrest, it is not permissible to search the house, or, what amounts to the same thing, the person of an individual, without a warrant. In his dissent in the Chimel case, Mr. Justice Frankfurter recognized that the temptation to such general searches was great, 351 U. S., at 804, and that the Court had in the past grappled with the problem. He said: "The case puts the Court in the position of holding that the security of the person has been sacrificed for the additional protection of the house, for here the papers found on the person were produced by a search of the house. Now it is said that this was legal and that the Sixth Amendment does not condemn it
