The concept of a health gradient (connections between health, environment, and economic factors) has emerged from studies suggesting that many social, physical, and environmental factors may independently affect health. These relationships are analyzed in a variety of ways, and the results of such analyses are often quantified in terms of their effect on life expectancy. Health measurement, however, has important limitations for this type of analysis, especially as it applies to the effects of the environment on health in complex societies. Risk-metering could offer one way to resolve these issues. It would involve estimating risks for all the major environmental health hazards in terms of how their expected health effects vary by income. This assessment could be used to quantify the level of risk within society and to evaluate the benefits of specific policies affecting the environment. An appraisal of the relative risk of cancer of the gastrointestinal tract would illustrate the concept of risk-metering. A public health approach to health improvement in developing nations would show how risk-metering could also advance their lives.
