He walked down the dusty, uneven street, his boots sinking into the mud and with each step, his knees buckling. He pushed his blisters up into the roof of his mouth and bit, hard, as he drew back from his last encounter with the teeth of an enemy. He was wounded and bleeding, the familiar smell of human flesh from battle still in his nostrils. For the second time in his life, he had tasted the taste of human blood. He knew that as long as he drew breath, he would remember that taste. He could still hear the whining of the propellers as his unit of the Queen's Own Hussars crashed into HMS Royalist, the first major battle of the time of Great Depression, 32 years ago.
