. The defrag utility can also be used to repair the disk. A: While hardware RAID isn't that common on consumer systems, software RAID is a supported feature of Windows. When you boot from the device with your OS selected, select "Advanced Options", and you should have a list of RAID options, including "Drive Types". In the example above, the "Advanced Options" boot menu has the entry "Drive Type: RAID" listed as an available device. Q: JavaBean - find bean name In my Java Bean I have several @Autowired fields. My question is, when I call `if(getSubject().getNames().contains(field))` how is that in Java Bean automatically translated to `if(this.getSubject().getNames().contains(field))` Is there any way to avoid such ugly code in Java Bean? A: No, it's not automatically translated. you can create a custom `StringUtils.contains` method that does this for you. Q: Issue with Click event binding on TableRow I have read a lot of answers on binding click event on a row. But all solutions I have seen are either based on `AncestorByMeans`, `IsMouseOver`, `IsSelected` or `RowHasChild`. Issue is that I have a TableRow which is not visible but is databound to a child table. I have tried the following code `void childTable_Cell_Click(object sender, RoutedEventArgs e) { Debug.WriteLine("Table cell Clicked"); Debug.WriteLine((sender as TableRow).ToString()); Console.WriteLine(((sender as TableRow).ToString()).Trim()); }` But the output is `System.Windows.Controls.TableRow` object - not supported. I have checked the object type by casting it to the TableRow type. So what am I missing here. Why the event is not being raised when I click on the childTableRow? Edit As described by Rahul below I have used `EventSetter` from `MVVMLight`. I wanted to verify the event handler for a different context and it says that 'EventSetter' does not contain a definition for 'Click' and
