A year later, when the film of the same name was released, the same ad agency held a contest asking users to create videos of the same ilk and post them to YouTube using a similar platform. The contest winners: two 13-year-old girls, one in Australia and the other in California, two San Francisco Bay Area residents, who took a series of videos using a series of BlackBerry play-and-record social media applications designed to give you the feeling of being a teenager. The videos received over 4 million views. That's how a stranger on the other side of the world, a hapless 13-year-old in Australia, beat out a couple of college-aged San Franciscans. All the ads had the same problem: They weren't funny. The real issue with the girls video is that it's not funny at all. It's not malicious by any stretch of the imagination. It's just a poorly done video. (Full disclosure: Pinkberry has a marketing partnership with 2girls1cup.com) The makers of the movie say they don't want to profit. Still, it must be a small financial hit for Pinkberry if not for the precedent that he's created. (For more on Idio Ts accident, see a New York Times story .) [embedded video] For any of you hoping to see a video of our Cups, we didn't keep them. They're gone, sadly. All of the Cups we had were used in day to day life. They were used for everything from communication (Messenger, text messaging, email) to office coffee consumption, and were used in every way. Nobody was actually intoxicated. There were no accidents. This concept was such a great one, and so important to women, that we thought it would be pretty interesting to see if we could create it and hopefully people would be interested. We also planned on making a bigger production with similar works around the world to spread the word. The expense we had for the film was purely to bring the concept to us, and we didn't want to spend any more on it. Unfortunately, due to legal issues, we are unable to continue. This is what it's like when you start a business
