But that hasn't stopped them from flying in droves to the Southeast Asian state of Singapore, one of the few top performers with respect to job creation here in China. According to estimates from the local government in Singapore, for example, businesses incorporated in the island city-state since 2010 have created well over a half million jobs. Other cities and states in Asia have similarly welcomed Chinese investment since the 2014 outbreak of the trade war, including another ASEAN member, Australia. A full-fledged free trade pact could provide long-overdue cover for Chinese companies in the rest of the region. While many Chinese have been operating in the region for years, the long-awaited free trade agreement with South Korea, the 12-country Comprehensive and Progressive Agreement for Trans-Pacific Partnership, was not signed until recently. With the agreement, Chinese firms can now operate within the agreement without the need to apply for separate deals or to seek separate permits. That has opened up opportunities for Chinese companies across several industries. AD AD
The logic behind free trade is simple: As countries open up and trade by their own terms, the number of barriers and restrictions on trade is reduced, the trade flow is increased and overall economic growth is improved. China has been an advocate for free trade for years. As secretary of commerce in the Chinese Communist Party and then president of the Asian Development Bank from 2003 to 2012, Zhu Guangyao was a driving force behind Chinese support for free trade agreements. In a 2011 speech, Zhu promoted the need to "open up" trade. The concept of free trade, he said, "requires more than reducing trade barriers. It also requires the absolute elimination of nontariff barriers that might otherwise impede trade." China understands that a trade war with the United States would largely benefit American companies and the American economy as a whole. Chinese industries are all too familiar with the effects of trade wars. In 2010, after complaints from American steel producers, the United States imposed a 50 percent tariff on imported steel. As a result, many Chinese companies established or expanded their steel operations in Canada and elsewhere and began building their supply chains abroad,
